

THE DREAMVISIONER – PROLOGUE

by S. Leigh Young

“What we are today comes from our thoughts of yesterday, and our present thoughts build our life of tomorrow. Our life is the creation of our mind.”
Buddha, founder of Buddhism, 4th century B.C.

The universe was entering its fourteen-billionth year when something subtle began to shift. The potential had always existed, embedded within the initial burst of energy that inspired its creation. Progressing for lightyears toward the inevitable, it reached a crescendo -- like a bubble expanding until it could no longer contain the pressure -- leaving in its wake a unique revolution of the mind.

It was often painful and violent, yet had forever existed within a shroud of possibilities. At times unstable and tumultuous, it was an extension of an eternal force and unlimited intelligence by which it was continuously nurtured. Lowering its vibrations from thought into gaseous particles and eventually into solid matter, its dream home appeared to be a beautiful and tiny globe within the vast cosmos, replicating the vastness of the mind to which all of life is linked. Billions of apparent separate aspects did not know their true identity, although some suspected it long before the revolution because they were able to see through the illusion.

Indeed, it was nothing more than a dream, unreal -- a façade initiated as a result of the first fearful thought by an extension of the source. Fearful thought could not exist within the source which did not acknowledge fear in any form. There, from the immense and brilliant burst it was manifested. One might envision it as a massive explosion of electromagnetic energy composed of all that has ever occurred and all that may ever occur; every particle, idea, decision and action possible, existing in potentialities, ready to be revealed by any one of its apparent individual aspects and, when manifested, having an undeniable affect on the whole.

The individual aspects of this mighty force, unaware they were all connected, evolved and accomplished what was required to survive in the raw environment. This is the way it was for eons until the revolution, when the apparent separate aspects began to realize their true potential and that each was endowed with a vital connection to all things. Once understood, it inevitably taught them how to think more like the source and their minds were expanded once more.

It began in the western hemisphere of the planet known as Earth in the year two thousand and twelve, Anno Domini.